TJC Group Founder and President Tim Johnson has spent more than 35 years helping organizations build stronger relationships with the communities they serve and the elected officials who represent them.

As a nationally recognized consultant in local stakeholder engagement, Johnson has advised many of the world's largest and most recognized industrial companies. He helps organizations build knowledge, strengthen understanding, and earn the trust and goodwill of their most important stakeholders.

A leading expert in creating, facilitating, managing, and revitalizing community advisory councils and community advisory panels (CACs/CAPs), he has established more than 60 councils across eight states for industry, education, and law enforcement. He has advanced more than 2,200 CAC and CAP meetings.

Johnson's background includes six years as a lead committee staffer for the Louisiana State Senate and five years as the director of business development for the construction and maintenance division of the Shaw Group. He served almost seven years as the director of training and then executive director of the Associated Builders and Contractors Pelican Chapter, leading one of the largest privately funded construction craft training centers in the U.S. with an enrollment of more than 1,600 students per semester.

For nearly 10 years, he was the executive producer and host of the Louisiana Business and Industry Show, a statewide weekly television program that reached an audience of more than 1.5 million homes on seven network affiliates across Louisiana.

Johnson, a graduate of Louisiana State University (LSU), lives outside of Baton Rouge in St. Gabriel, Louisiana. He and his wife, Kelly, have three adult children and a son-in-law: daughter Dr. Hillary Johnson and her husband, Scotty Anderson, and sons Peyton and Nicholas. He also enjoys singing in his church choir, reading biographies and history, running, and cheering on LSU Athletics.
